Observations on Harbour Illumination

Prior studies of coastal illumination assume a stationary observer. We relax that assumption and report measurements gathered from a moving vessel. The apparatus recorded luminance at fixed intervals throughout the night, producing a dataset of considerable density. Results indicate substantial variation attributable to atmospheric moisture rather than to lamp performance.

Prior studies of coastal illumination assume a stationary observer. We relax that assumption and report measurements gathered from a moving vessel. The apparatus recorded luminance at fixed intervals throughout the night, producing a dataset of considerable density. Results indicate substantial variation attributable to atmospheric moisture rather than to lamp performance.