Page 1. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 1. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 1. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 2. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 2. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 2. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 3. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 3. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 3. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 4. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 4. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 4. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 5. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 5. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 5. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 6. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 6. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 6. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 7. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 7. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 7. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 8. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 8. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 8. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 9. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 9. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 9. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 10. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 10. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 10. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 11. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 11. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 11. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 12. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 12. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 12. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 13. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 13. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 13. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 14. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 14. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 14. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 15. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 15. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 15. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 16. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 16. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 16. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 17. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 17. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 17. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 18. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 18. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 18. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 19. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 19. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 19. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 20. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 20. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 20. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 21. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 21. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 21. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 22. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 22. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 22. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 23. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 23. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 23. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 24. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 24. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 24. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 25. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 25. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 25. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 26. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 26. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 26. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 27. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 27. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 27. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 28. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 28. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 28. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 29. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 29. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 29. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 30. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 30. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 30. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 31. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 31. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 31. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 32. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 32. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 32. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 33. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 33. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 33. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 34. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 34. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 34. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 35. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 35. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 35. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 36. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 36. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 36. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 37. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 37. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 37. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 38. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 38. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 38. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 39. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 39. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 39. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 40. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 40. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 40. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 41. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 41. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 41. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 42. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 42. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 42. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 43. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 43. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 43. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 44. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 44. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 44. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 45. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 45. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 45. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 46. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 46. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 46. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 47. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 47. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 47. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 48. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 48. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 48. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 49. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 49. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 49. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 50. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 50. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 50. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 51. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 51. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 51. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 52. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 52. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 52. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 53. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 53. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 53. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 54. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 54. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 54. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 55. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 55. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 55. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 56. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 56. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 56. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 57. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 57. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 57. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 58. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 58. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 58. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 59. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 59. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 59. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 60. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 60. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 60. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 61. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 61. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 61. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 62. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 62. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 62. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 63. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 63. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 63. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 64. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 64. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 64. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 65. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 65. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 65. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 66. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 66. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 66. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 67. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 67. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 67. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 68. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 68. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 68. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 69. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 69. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 69. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 70. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 70. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 70. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 71. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 71. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 71. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 72. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 72. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 72. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 73. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 73. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 73. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 74. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 74. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 74. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 75. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 75. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 75. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 76. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 76. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 76. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 77. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 77. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 77. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 78. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 78. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 78. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 79. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 79. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 79. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 80. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 80. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 80. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 81. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 81. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 81. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 82. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 82. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 82. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 83. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 83. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 83. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 84. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 84. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 84. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 85. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 85. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 85. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 86. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 86. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 86. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 87. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 87. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 87. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 88. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 88. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 88. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 89. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 89. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 89. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 90. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 90. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 90. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 91. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 91. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 91. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 92. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 92. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 92. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 93. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 93. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 93. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 94. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 94. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 94. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 95. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 95. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 95. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 96. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 96. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 96. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 97. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 97. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 97. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 98. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 98. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 98. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 99. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 99. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 99. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 100. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 100. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 100. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 101. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 101. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 101. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 102. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 102. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 102. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 103. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 103. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 103. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 104. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 104. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 104. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 105. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 105. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 105. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 106. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 106. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 106. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 107. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 107. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 107. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 108. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 108. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 108. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 109. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 109. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 109. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 110. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 110. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 110. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 111. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 111. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 111. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 112. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 112. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 112. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 113. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 113. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 113. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 114. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 114. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 114. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 115. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 115. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 115. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 116. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 116. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 116. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 117. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 117. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 117. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 118. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 118. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 118. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 119. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 119. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 119. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 120. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 120. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 120. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 121. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 121. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 121. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 122. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 122. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 122. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 123. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 123. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 123. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 124. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 124. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 124. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 125. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 125. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 125. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 126. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 126. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 126. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 127. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 127. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 127. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 128. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 128. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 128. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 129. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 129. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 129. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 130. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 130. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 130. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 131. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 131. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 131. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 132. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 132. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 132. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 133. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 133. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 133. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 134. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 134. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 134. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 135. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 135. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 135. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 136. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 136. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 136. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 137. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 137. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 137. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 138. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 138. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 138. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 139. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 139. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 139. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 140. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 140. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 140. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 141. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 141. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 141. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 142. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 142. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 142. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 143. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 143. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 143. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 144. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 144. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 144. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 145. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 145. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 145. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 146. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 146. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 146. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 147. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 147. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 147. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 148. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 148. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 148. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 149. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 149. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 149. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 150. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 150. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 150. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 151. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 151. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 151. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 152. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 152. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 152. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 153. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 153. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 153. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 154. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 154. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 154. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 155. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 155. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 155. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 156. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 156. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 156. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 157. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 157. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 157. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 158. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 158. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 158. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 159. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 159. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 159. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 160. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 160. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 160. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 161. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 161. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 161. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 162. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 162. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 162. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 163. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 163. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 163. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 164. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 164. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 164. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 165. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 165. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 165. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 166. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 166. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 166. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 167. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 167. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 167. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 168. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 168. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 168. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 169. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 169. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 169. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 170. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 170. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 170. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 171. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 171. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 171. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 172. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 172. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 172. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 173. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 173. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 173. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 174. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 174. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 174. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 175. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 175. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 175. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 176. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 176. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 176. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 177. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 177. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 177. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 178. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 178. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 178. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 179. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 179. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 179. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 180. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 180. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 180. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 181. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 181. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 181. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 182. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 182. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 182. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 183. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 183. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 183. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 184. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 184. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 184. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 185. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 185. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 185. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 186. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 186. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 186. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 187. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 187. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 187. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 188. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 188. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 188. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 189. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 189. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 189. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 190. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 190. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 190. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 191. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 191. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 191. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 192. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 192. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 192. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 193. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 193. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 193. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 194. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 194. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 194. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 195. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 195. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 195. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 196. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 196. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 196. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 197. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 197. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 197. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 198. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 198. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 198. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 199. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 199. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 199. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 200. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 200. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 200. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 201. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 201. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 201. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 202. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 202. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 202. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 203. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 203. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 203. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 204. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 204. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 204. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 205. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 205. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 205. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 206. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 206. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 206. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 207. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 207. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 207. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 208. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 208. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 208. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 209. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 209. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 209. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 210. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 210. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 210. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 211. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 211. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 211. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 212. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 212. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 212. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 213. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 213. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 213. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 214. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 214. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 214. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 215. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 215. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 215. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 216. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 216. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 216. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 217. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 217. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 217. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 218. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 218. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 218. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 219. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 219. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 219. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 220. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 220. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 220. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 221. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 221. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 221. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 222. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 222. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 222. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 223. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 223. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 223. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 224. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 224. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 224. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 225. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 225. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 225. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 226. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 226. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 226. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 227. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 227. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 227. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 228. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 228. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 228. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 229. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 229. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 229. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 230. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 230. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 230. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 231. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 231. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 231. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 232. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 232. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 232. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 233. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 233. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 233. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 234. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 234. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 234. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 235. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 235. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 235. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 236. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 236. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 236. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 237. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 237. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 237. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 238. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 238. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 238. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 239. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 239. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 239. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 240. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 240. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 240. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 241. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 241. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 241. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 242. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 242. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 242. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 243. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 243. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 243. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 244. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 244. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 244. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 245. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 245. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 245. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 246. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 246. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 246. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 247. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 247. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 247. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 248. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 248. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 248. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 249. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 249. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 249. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 250. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 250. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 250. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 251. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 251. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 251. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 252. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 252. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 252. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 253. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 253. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 253. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 254. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 254. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 254. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 255. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 255. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 255. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 256. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 256. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 256. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 257. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 257. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 257. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 258. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 258. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 258. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 259. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 259. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 259. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 260. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 260. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 260. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 261. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 261. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 261. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 262. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 262. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 262. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 263. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 263. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 263. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 264. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 264. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 264. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 265. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 265. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 265. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 266. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 266. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 266. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 267. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 267. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 267. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 268. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 268. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 268. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 269. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 269. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 269. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 270. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 270. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 270. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 271. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 271. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 271. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 272. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 272. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 272. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 273. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 273. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 273. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 274. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 274. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 274. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 275. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 275. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 275. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 276. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 276. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 276. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 277. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 277. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 277. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 278. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 278. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 278. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 279. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 279. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 279. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 280. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 280. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 280. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 281. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 281. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 281. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 282. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 282. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 282. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 283. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 283. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 283. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 284. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 284. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 284. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 285. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 285. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 285. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 286. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 286. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 286. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 287. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 287. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 287. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 288. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 288. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 288. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 289. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 289. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 289. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 290. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 290. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 290. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 291. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 291. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 291. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 292. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 292. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 292. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 293. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 293. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 293. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 294. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 294. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 294. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 295. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 295. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 295. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 296. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 296. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 296. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 297. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 297. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 297. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 298. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 298. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 298. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 299. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 299. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 299. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 300. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 300. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 300. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 301. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 301. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 301. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 302. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 302. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 302. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 303. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 303. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 303. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 304. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 304. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 304. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 305. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 305. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 305. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 306. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 306. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 306. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 307. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 307. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 307. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 308. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 308. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 308. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 309. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 309. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 309. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 310. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 310. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 310. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 311. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 311. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 311. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 312. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 312. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 312. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 313. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 313. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 313. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 314. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 314. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 314. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 315. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 315. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 315. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 316. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 316. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 316. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 317. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 317. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 317. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 318. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 318. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 318. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 319. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 319. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 319. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 320. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 320. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 320. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 321. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 321. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 321. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 322. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 322. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 322. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 323. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 323. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 323. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 324. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 324. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 324. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 325. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 325. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 325. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 326. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 326. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 326. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 327. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 327. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 327. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 328. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 328. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 328. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 329. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 329. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 329. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 330. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 330. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 330. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 331. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 331. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 331. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 332. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 332. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 332. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 333. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 333. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 333. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 334. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 334. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 334. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 335. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 335. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 335. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 336. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 336. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 336. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 337. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 337. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 337. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 338. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 338. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 338. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 339. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 339. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 339. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 340. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 340. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 340. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 341. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 341. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 341. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 342. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 342. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 342. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 343. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 343. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 343. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 344. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 344. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 344. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 345. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 345. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 345. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 346. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 346. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 346. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 347. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 347. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 347. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 348. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 348. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 348. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 349. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 349. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 349. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 350. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 350. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 350. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 351. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 351. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 351. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 352. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 352. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 352. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 353. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 353. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 353. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 354. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 354. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 354. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 355. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 355. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 355. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 356. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 356. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 356. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 357. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 357. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 357. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 358. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 358. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 358. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 359. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 359. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 359. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 360. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 360. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 360. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 361. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 361. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 361. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 362. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 362. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 362. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 363. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 363. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 363. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 364. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 364. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 364. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 365. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 365. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 365. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 366. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 366. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 366. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 367. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 367. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 367. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 368. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 368. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 368. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 369. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 369. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 369. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 370. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 370. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 370. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 371. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 371. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 371. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 372. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 372. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 372. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 373. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 373. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 373. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 374. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 374. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 374. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 375. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 375. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 375. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 376. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 376. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 376. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 377. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 377. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 377. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 378. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 378. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 378. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 379. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 379. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 379. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 380. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 380. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 380. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 381. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 381. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 381. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 382. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 382. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 382. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 383. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 383. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 383. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 384. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 384. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 384. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 385. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 385. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 385. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 386. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 386. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 386. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 387. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 387. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 387. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 388. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 388. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 388. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 389. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 389. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 389. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 390. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 390. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 390. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 391. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 391. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 391. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 392. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 392. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 392. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 393. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 393. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 393. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 394. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 394. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 394. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 395. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 395. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 395. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 396. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 396. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 396. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 397. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 397. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 397. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 398. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 398. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 398. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 399. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 399. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 399. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 400. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 400. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.

Page 400. The lighthouse keeper watched the harbour empty itself of boats, one patient hull at a time, until only the old ferry remained. She had read every book the mainland sent her, and the margins of each were crowded with questions nobody had answered. Tonight the lamp turned above her with its familiar complaint, a sound she had long ago stopped hearing. The weather report promised a storm that would arrive before midnight and leave behind the kind of silence that makes a person reconsider their choices.